

The matter of masks

Conflicting views on face-covering protocols divide the Bethel community and spur administrative response.

By Rachel Blood and Molly Wilson

Photo by Emma Gottschalk

Sophomore nursing student Naomi Petersen finished wiping a table in the Monson Dining Center during an April dinner shift. She turned to find two male students wearing masks under their noses standing by a table and talking to a friend. Petersen asked the students to wear their masks properly. With a "yeah, yeah," Petersen was dismissed. Taking a deep breath, she walked away to tell her manager.

Dean of Student Life Jim Benjamin cites that 88 official documentations of follow-up emails regarding COVID-19 policies were reported in the fall 2020 semester. At this point in the spring 2021 semester, there are 53. Benjamin attributes the lower number to students simply being used to or tired of the pandemic, but the decrease in reports does not necessarily indicate a decrease in protocol breaks.

The majority of the reports stemmed from requests for others to wear a mask in a common area such as a residence hall. Very few reports have occurred within the classroom. Others have included breaking room capacity or visitation rules. Benjamin suspects the reason the fall reports reached a higher number was because the Bethel community was still getting accustomed to the reality of the recent pandemic requirements.

The standard response for most of said reports is a follow-up email clarifying the face covering policy. Repeated incidents might result in a person-to-person interaction to talk about the situation. Oftentimes Benjamin is the one to clarify protocol with that student, try to understand the reasoning behind their actions and remind the student that peers or their families may be immunocompromised.

"The goal of all of that was really to have a reasonable response. We're trying to do this together," Benjamin said.

The most frequent concern brought to Student Life comes from a lack of face coverings in the BC and common buildings. Student Life chose to implement a proactive practice of sending out Student Life employees to thank people around the buildings for wearing their masks and giving out gum and mints as a thank you. On occasion, this job also requires asking students to pull their masks up.

"It's a little dicey because people are drinking or eating," Benjamin said. "Sometimes, that seems really clear to me, but then we have some students who sit with a drink all day long, and that's the reason they say they don't have to wear a mask. We're asking people to be reasonable."

The most severe consequence Student Life has thus far had to resort to was a temporary ban on the non-compliant student's presence in common buildings. Concerned peers reported the student's refusal to wear a mask to Student Life, and multiple meetings were held. However, the student continued to refuse to wear their mask in common areas.

Benjamin said the student wore a mask properly while in class and while practicing and competing as an athlete, so he gave an appropriate consequence: The student could attend class and practice, but was temporarily suspended from the common buildings.

Benjamin praises staff, faculty and students alike for rising to meet the challenges presented by the pandemic. Bethel's goal has been to remain open for the entirety of the school year with students on campus and attending in-person classes.

Although many value mask-wearing and participate in keeping others accountable and safe in public spaces in order to keep students on-campus, others argue face coverings are simply not effective.

"Even on the box of surgical masks, it says it does not prevent the spread of COVID-19," freshman special education major Raine Raderschadt said.

For freshman missional ministries student Lily Owen, the issue rests with a different kind of health: mental.

"The connection piece has been so left out of the conversation," Owen said. "We have another population that's really suffering, and they don't get any say in improving their wellbeing."

It also concerns Owen that individuals have a tendency to think and speak negatively of peers who choose not to wear masks without knowing the reasoning behind the choice.

"At some point, we have to get back to life. And people need life," Owen said. "There are some people who need normal life or they won't continue to live."

Senior organizational communications major Emma Boley simply wants a choice. She supported masks at the beginning of the pandemic, but following the release of a vaccine, believes people should be able to choose whether to wear a mask based on their comfort level.

For others, the issue with the mask mandate is not a matter of personal choice as much as a matter of the decisions of individual businesses and institutions. PSEO student and biochemistry major Sam Schutz wears his masks in all public spaces as required, but does not believe that a state mandate should be in place. On a trip to Florida, where the mask mandate has been lifted, every business Schutz entered required face coverings.

"That was because of the business owners being responsible," Schutz said. "I shouldn't be allowed to walk into some random person's store not wearing a mask if they want me to. They should have every right to kick me out."

Senior social studies major Tyler Hayft sat at a table in the Brushaber Commons just before spring break, coffee in one hand and a donut in the other, with his mask around his chin. He said that Heritage Hall Resident Director Emily Allen approached him and asked him to put on his mask, to which he explained that he was eating and socially distanced from those around him. When Allen continued to request that he put on his mask, Hayft grew frustrated because he did not see where he was at fault. Allen reported Hayft to Student Life, who followed their protocol for mask policy violations.

"It was lonely on campus last spring," Allen said. "Masks are a part of what allowed us to be here safely."

In response to the increase in face covering conflict, Bethel nursing students Lizzy Carson and David Jankowski, communications student Brook Lorseenson and psychology student Alaina Sandau have worked alongside Professor of Nursing Kristin E. Sandau, PhD, RN to implement a pro-mask campaign across campus.

Carson addressed the reality that those who have access to campus services and technology may easily overlook the hardships the pandemic places on surrounding communities.

"When I look at the demographics of those with underlying health conditions and those with lack of accessibility to resourcing, I am reminded of the privileges which I hold," Carson said. "With that in mind, I am motivated to wear my mask and continue to do what I can do to stop the spread so that I can better love the Bethel community and our surrounding neighbors too."

"We are the wealthiest country on earth, and through our collective actions, did not protect our citizens."

PROVOST ROBIN RYLAARSDAM