Fastest-Growing Tech Jobs

Tech jobs are truly the jobs of the future. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, employment of computer and information technology occupations is projected to grow 13% through 2026 — faster than the average for all occupations.

With more than 500,000 positions to be added over the next decade, these in-demand jobs — from software developers to computer programmers and network administrators — will benefit from the greater emphasis on cloud computing, the collection of storage and big data, and information security, according to the BLS.

The red-hot tech sector has created a wide-open market for IT job seekers as evidenced by four recruiting tactics noted by recruiting experts noted recently on the website The Enterprisers Project. These include:

A shortened hiring process designed to attract talent in a field where top talent often field multiple offers.

Broadening or loosening of skills requirements, in which employers are less focused on finding the “perfect” candidate.

Offering flex schedules and remote work opportunities that recognize work-life balance that many in the field place premium value on.

A healthy corporate culture and improved perks that suggest an environment that supports social responsibility and diversity, as well as extras that go beyond free lunches that have proven valuable in attracting and retaining the best employees.

The good news: Many of these positions can be had without a college degree and the median wage for computer and IT occupations was $86,3320 in May 2018. Employers understand the right combination of experience, aptitude and willingness to learn on the job can eliminate the need for a degree or an advanced degree. And many, if not all, offer the opportunity to obtain industry-standard certification and educational opportunities.

The better news: New technology is developing at a rapid rate, which means the sector will create even more jobs to support these advancements.

The coastal tech hubs will absorb the majority of these jobs, but there’s been a boom in technology and innovation across the U.S. — especially in the Midwest and South. USA Today recently identified the 15 cities driving hiring in the high-tech sector and noted jobs expanding in cities such as Denver; Ann Arbor, Michigan; Palm Bay, Florida (home to NASA’s Kennedy Space Center); and Durham-Chapel Hill, North Carolina. Other mid-size cities with an eye toward tech: Chattanooga, Tennessee; Kansas City, Missouri; and Columbus, Ohio.

While it has always been true that technology and automation make many jobs obsolete, it’s also true that new opportunities replace them — in the STEM fields — and offer more advancement, pay and opportunity.

So whether you’re a student deciding on a career path, contemplating a career change or seeking retraining to create new skills sets there’s never been a better time to look for new work than in the tech sector.
